start homeward fathomless as to what home might make of us from The River You Touch When Chris Dombrowski burst onto the literary scene with Body of Water the book was acclaimed as a classic Jim Harrison and its author compared with John McPhee Dombrowski begins the highly anticipated All of It Everywhere with a question as timely as it is profound What does a meaningful mindful sustainable inhabitation on this small planet look like in the anthropocene He answers this fundamental question of our time initially by listening lovingly to rivers and the land they pulse through in his adopted home of Montana Transplants from the post industrial Midwest he and his partner Mary assemble a life based precariously on her income as a schoolteacher his as a poet and fly fishing guide Before long their first child arrives followed soon after by two more all free beings in whom flourishes an essential kind of knowing whose capacity for wonder may be the beacon by which we see ourselves through this dark epoch And around the young family circles a community of friends river rafting guides and conservationists climbers and wildlife biologists who seek to cultivate a way of living in place that moves beyond the mythologized West of appropriation and extraction Moving seamlessly from the quotidian diapers the mortgage a threadbare bank account to the metaphysical time memory how to live a life of integrity Dombrowski illuminates the experience of fatherhood with intimacy and grace Spending time in wild places with their children he learns that their youthful sense of wonder at the beauty and connectivity of the more than human world is not naivete to be shed but rather wisdom most of us lose along the way wisdom that is essential for the possibility of transformation
