Technological Change, Financial Innovation, and Diffusion in Banking W. Scott Frame, 2010-08 Discusses the technological change and financial innovation that commercial banking has experienced during the past 25 years Describes the role of the financial system in economies and how technological change and financial innovation can improve social welfare Surveys the literature relating to several specific financial innovations which are new products or services production processes or organizational forms The past quarter century has been a period of substantial change in terms of banking products services and production technologies Moreover while much effort has been devoted to understanding the characteristics of users and adopters of financial innovations we still know little about how and why financial innovations are initially developed

Informed Finance and Technological Change Ana Maria Herrera, 2014 This paper empirically investigates the effect of "informed finance" on technological change We argue that the theoretical literature offers conflicting predictions on whether the information of financiers fosters or impedes firms innovation Using data from a sample of Italian manufacturing firms we find that the information of firms main banks proxied by the duration of credit relationships fosters innovation We also find some evidence that this positive effect is economically and statistically more significant for product than for process innovations The latter result may signal that the alleged tight secrecy of process innovations exacerbates the negative effects of banks information on innovation
