

A social conscience in the global marketplace? Labour dimensions of codes of conduct, social labelling and investor initiatives

Janelle DILLER*

Over the past decade, a new generation of private-sector initiatives in enterprise social responsibility has been born. Once the primary domain of large enterprises seeking to be good citizens, social responsibility is becoming a generally accepted principle that applies to a growing variety of business partnerships involving multinational and local enterprises in industrialized and developing economies alike.¹ New models of enterprise social initiatives have replaced the "self-applied", single-enterprise model. Social specifications now govern joint ventures, licences and supply contracts across the entire chain of transactions necessary for procuring and marketing products and services. Beyond these enterprise-generated initiatives, an increasing number of strategic alliances are being set up in order to pursue systems of accountability. A wide range of actors thus participate in private-sector initiatives across the global, regional, national and local levels; and recently, hybrid coalitions between enterprise, workers, non-governmental organizations (NGOs), investors and others have emerged as well.

This article focuses on private-sector initiatives that address labour practices in transnational enterprise operations, and comments on their effectiveness. Specifically, it examines codes of conduct, social labelling programmes and investor initiatives, drawing inter alia on a preliminary review of some

* ILO, Geneva.

¹ The concept of enterprise social responsibility has evolved over recent decades. In 1965, the Delhi Declaration, developed at an international seminar on "Social Responsibility of Business", articulated a prototype model of what has evolved into "stakeholder theory". In the United States, theorists emphasized the need for enterprise to accept the community as a stakeholder in governance, while in Japan enterprises developed a sense of linkage to national values, community life and the environment. For the purposes of this article, the term "stakeholders" refers to "individuals and groups who may affect or be affected by the actions, decisions, policies, practices or goals of an enterprise" (Carroll, 1996, p. 74).
