Abstract: This article discusses the growing importance of digital competencies in education, specifically focusing on the role of technical infrastructure in schools and staff support strategies. The discussion aims at the introduction of the ICT coordinator role in Czech Republic schools. Analysis indicates that schools with an ICT coordinator exhibit improved technology access for students and teachers, not solely determined by computer quantity per pupil. Noteworthy differences lie in the flexibility and availability of technology, with ICT coordinator-aided schools having more mobile computers, mobile labs, and more vital facilitation of BYOD methods. In conclusion, while recognizing the partial nature of school technology equipment data, the article concludes that training teachers and implementing the ICT coordinator role positively impact ICT technology use in schools. Recommendations based on Czech Republic research include establishing the ICT coordinator position, providing financial incentives, and reducing direct teaching loads. Future research should track changes in ICT equipment during ICT coordinators' tenures and explore technology deployment dynamics, emphasizing collaboration between ICT coordinators, school management, and individual teachers.

Keywords: ICT coordinators; BYOD; school ICT equipment; school infrastructure; mobile computers labs

1. Introduction

Digital competencies (Pettersson, 2018) play an increasingly important role today and are important to understanding the current world (OECD, 2010). Much attention is paid to their promotion and development. In line with Harris et al. (2009), we note that models of digital technology implementation are often technocentric. They focus too much on technology skills and ignore the complexity of learning using technology. Technological equipment is one of many prerequisites for developing digital skills. How digital competencies are used is crucial for the effective development of digital competencies. It is necessary to change the system and teaching methods (Benvenuti et al., 2011). The main change factor is teachers' digital competencies, focusing on whether teachers perceive digital technologies as adding value to their teaching and students' learning. Five years ago, less than 40 percent of teachers were ready to use digital technology in their classes (TALIS, 2019). This issue has been captured at the European level in a specific competency framework called the European Framework of Digital Competences for Teachers (Redecker, 2017) and in the Digital Education Action Plan (2021–2027).

It is very important to provide teachers with methodological support in implementing modern technologies and digital competencies (Strudler and Hearingthon, 2008). One possible way is to create ICT coordinator positions. These positions were already established in schools in the 1980s (León-Jariego et al., 2020).
