

Testability – Factors (1)

Control(lability)

- The better we can control the system (in isolation), the more and better testing can be done, automated, and optimized
- Ability to apply and control the inputs to the system under test or place it in specified states (for example reset to start state, roll back)
- Interaction with the system under test (SUT) through control points

Control(lability)

Visibility / observability

Visibility / observability

- What you see is what can be tested
- Ability to observe the inputs, outputs, states, internals, error conditions, resource utilization, and other side effects of the system under test
- Interaction with the system under test (SUT) through observation points

Availability, operability

- The better it works, the more efficiently it can be tested
- Bugs add overhead for analysis and reporting to testing
- No bugs block the execution of the tests

Simplicity, consistency, and decomposability

- The less there is to test, the more quickly we can test it
- Standards, (code / design) guidelines, naming conventions
- Layering, modularization, isolation, loose coupling, separation of concern, SOLID
- Internal software quality (architecture, design, code), technical debt

Stability

- The fewer the changes, the fewer the disruptions to testing
- Changes are infrequent, controlled and do not invalidate existing tests
- Software recovers well from failures

Understandability, knowledge (of expected results)

- The more (and better) information we have, the smarter we will test
- Design is well understood, good and accurate technical documentation
